56 Nation-Building, Propaganda, and Literature in Francophone Africa It is this uncertainty that drives us to want to live differently. We are also brought together by a lack of means. Our troupe is made up of actors, civil servants, and people who work in the private sector. What brings us together is a common dream. We allow ourselves to

Nation-Building, Propaganda, and Literature in Francophone ...

Nation-Building, Propaganda, and Literature in Francophone Africa explores the relationship between literature, politics, and the state in the Congo specifically and more tangentially in the rest of Sub-Saharan Francophone Africa. Thomas contends that politics and literature are particularly intertwined in the Congo, "where the post-revolutionary Marxist-Leninist elite exercising governmental authority between 1969 and 1991 sponsored an official literature of the state" (5).
