But it isn't depressing. On the contrary, I mark the day I started work with hospice more than 20 years after I graduated nursing school as the beginning of my real education, an education in hope and joy. I've learned that death is not to be feared. In God's loving hands it's the door to peace and everlasting life.

Proof of Life After Death Hospice Nurse | Guideposts

While many see death as a tragedy and horror, for some people, death is so much more than an end to life. Perhaps the negative connotation of death comes from perceiving it from the eyes of those who have suffered losses. Nobody wants to lose the people they love. Nurses who have lost beloved patients can relate to this to a high degree.

A Good Death: The inside story of a hospice

Death is a reality of life, something everyone has to deal with—nurses more than most. In just about every nursing specialty, you're going to come across death, and part of learning to become a nurse is learning how to cope with loss.

How Nurses Can Cope with Loss When a Patient Dies

I started collecting stories of people's experience with death. I wanted to know what actually happened at the time of death so that I could see if my mother's experience was typical. What I found is the more I heard these stories the more my mother's death seemed less traumatic. It seemed more like a part of the way we live and die.
